Brian that night. He left Madge almost immediately and went home, but he did not go to bed. He feit pasted the greater part of the night walking up and down his room, occupied with his own sad thoughts. He was wondering in his own mind what could be the meaning of Roger Moreland's visit to Mark Frettiby. All the evidence itor.

"But I thought that papa said he was not to be disturbed?"

"Yes, miss, but the gentleman had an appointment with him."

"Poor papa!" sighed Madge, turning again to the plano. "He has slways got such a lot to do."

But then the cry which Frettlby had given after the inwhich Frettlby had given after the in-terview had lasted a short time proved that he had been startled. Madge had gone upstains and found the door locked, her father refusing her admis-sion. Now, why was he so anxious Mereland should not be seen by any one? That he had made some stact-ling revelation was certain and Fitz-gerald felt sure that it was in connec-tion with the hansom cab murder case. tion with the hansom cab murder case. He wearied himself with conjectures about the matter and toward daybreak threw himself, dressed as he was, on the bed, and slept heavily till 12 o'clock the next day. When he arose and boxed at himself in the glass he was tartied at the haggard and worn appearance of his face. The moment he was awake his mind went back to Mark Frettiby and the visit of Roger Moreland.

The front door closed with a clicking third.

"I must leave this place," he said to himself, "every chance remark seems to hear on the murder, and I'm not anxious to have it constantly by my side like the skeleton at the feast.

Suddenly, he recollected the letter which he held in his hand, and which he now looked at for the first time. It proved to be from Madge, and tearing it open hastily he read it.

"I cannot understand what is the matter with pape," she wrote. "Ever since that man Moreland left last night he has sault himself up in his study, and is writing there hour after hour. I went up this morning, but he would not let me in. He did not come down to break-fast, and I am getting
